Maggot Moon
Sally Gardner
For you the dreamers
Overlooked at school
Never won prizes

You who will own tomorrow.
One

I’m wondering what if.
What if the football hadn’t gone over the wall.
What if Hector had never gone looking for it.
What if he hadn’t kept the dark secret to himself.
What if . . .
Then I suppose I would be telling myself another story.
You see, the what ifs are as boundless as the stars.
Two

Miss Connolly, our old teacher, always said start your story at the beginning. Make it a clean window for us to see through. Though I don’t really think that’s what she meant. No one, not even Miss Connolly, dares write about what we see through that smeared glass. Best not to look out. If you have to, then best to keep quiet. I would never be so daft as to write this down, not on paper.

Even if I could, I couldn’t.
You see, I can’t spell my own name.
Standish Treadwell.
Can’t read, can’t write,
Standish Treadwell isn’t bright.
Miss Connolly was the only teacher ever to say that what makes Standish stand apart is that he is an original. Hector smiled when I told him that. He said he personally had clocked that one straight away.

‘There are train-track thinkers, then there’s you, Standish, a breeze in the park of imagination.’

I said that again to myself. ‘Then there is Standish, with an imagination that breezes through the park, doesn’t even see the benches, just notices that there is no dog shit where dog shit should be.’
I wasn’t listening to the lesson when the note arrived from the headmaster’s office. Because me and Hector were in the city across the water, in another country where the buildings don’t stop rising until they pin the clouds to the sky. Where the sun shines in Technicolor. Life at the end of a rainbow. I don’t care what they tell us, I’ve seen it on the TV. They sing in the streets – they even sing in the rain, sing while dancing round a lamp post.

This is the dark ages. We don’t sing.

But this was the best daydream I’d had since Hector and his family vanished. Mostly I tried not to think about Hector. Instead I liked to concentrate on imagining myself on our planet, the one Hector and I had invented. Juniper.
It was better than being worried sick about what had happened to him. Except this was one of the best daydreams I’d had for a long time. It felt as if Hector was near me again. We were driving round in one of those huge, ice-cream-coloured Cadillacs. I could almost smell the leather. Bright blue, sky blue, leather seats blue. Hector in the back. Me with my arm resting on the chrome of the wound-down window, my hand on the wheel, driving us home for Croca-Colas in a shiny kitchen with a checked tablecloth and a garden that looks as if the grass was Hoovered.

That’s when I became vaguely aware of Mr Gunnell saying my name.

‘Standish Treadwell. You are wanted in the headmaster’s office.’

Frick-fracking hell! I should have seen that coming. Mr Gunnell’s cane made my eyes smart, hit me so hard on the back of my hand that it left a calling card. Two thin, red weals. Mr Gunnell wasn’t tall but his muscles were made out of old army tanks with well-oiled army-tank arms. He wore a toupee that had a life of its own, battling to stay stuck on the top of his sweaty, shiny head. His other features didn’t do him any favours. He had a small, dark, snot-mark moustache that went down to his mouth. He smiled only when using his cane – that smile curdled the corner of his mouth so that his dried-up leech of a tongue stuck out. Thinking about it, I am not sure the word smile is right. Maybe it just twisted that way when he applied his mind to his favourite sport, hurting you. He wasn’t that worried where the cane landed as long as it hit flesh, made you jump.

You see, they only sing across the water.
Here the sky fell in long ago.
But the thing that really scratched at me was this: I must have been so many miles away. I didn’t even see Mr Gunnell approaching, although there was a runway between me and his desk. I mean, I sat at the very back of the class – the blackboard could have been in another country. The words were just circus horses dancing up and down. At least, they never stayed still long enough for me to work out what they were saying.

The only one I could read was the huge red word that was stamped over the picture of the moon. Slapped you in the gob, that word did.

MOTHERLAND.

Being stupid, and not being anything that fitted neatly on to lined paper, I’d sat at the back of the class long enough to know I’d become all but invisible. Only when Mr Gunnell’s army-tank arms were in need of some exercise did I come into focus.

Only then did I see red.
There was no getting away from it. I’d got lazy. I’d got used to relying on Hector to warn me of oncoming doom. That daydream made me forget Hector had disappeared. I was on my own.

Mr Gunnell got hold of my ear and pinched it hard, so hard my eyes watered. I didn’t cry. I never cry. What’s the use of tears? Gramps said that if he were to start crying, he didn’t think he would stop – there was too much to cry about.

I think he was right. Salty water wasted in muddy puddles. Tears flood everything, put a lump in the throat, tears do. Make me want to scream, tears do. Tell you this, it was hard, what with all that ear pulling. I did my best to keep my mind on Planet Juniper, the one
Hector and I alone had discovered. We were going to launch our very own space mission, the two of us, then the world would wake up to the fact it was not alone. We would make contact with the Juniparians who knew right from wrong, who could zap Greenflies, leather-coat men and Mr Gunnell into the dark arse of oblivion.

We had agreed we would bypass the moon. Who wanted to go there when the Motherland was about to put her red and black flag in its unsoiled silver surface?
Mr Gunnell didn’t like me. I think it was personal. Everything is personal with Mr Gunnell. I was a personal affront to his intelligence. I was an affront to his sense of order and decency. Just to make sure everyone got the message about the affront that was me, he pulled my tie undone. He had that smile on his face, the tongue sticking out one, as he closed the classroom door behind me.

I didn’t have a problem with the caning. Or with the fact that my hands still smarted. I had a small problem with the ear pulling. I was only a tiny bit worried about the headmaster. I didn’t know then about the trouble, or how deep it went.

But maybe I got an inkling of it the moment Mr Gunnell pulled my tie undone, the git. You see, I can’t do up my tie, and he knew it.

That tie had not been untied for a personal record of one year. That was the longest time I had ever managed to keep the knot intact. In fact the fabric had become so shiny that it moved with no problem just wide enough for my head to slip through and then close up as neat as a whistle at the top, so I looked spick and span. I mean, that was the idea. It had stayed this way because of Hector. He wouldn’t let any boy mess with me. The days of torment I had believed to be behind me. That fricking, undone, hangman’s rope of a tie made me feel like sliding down the wall on to the floor and giving up, letting the tears for once get some exercise. For there was one thing I couldn’t do: go to the headmaster’s office without a tie. I might just as well throw myself from the window head first. Say it came undone on the way down. Say due to concussion from the fall I had forgotten how to tie a tie.

I think I knew, if I was honest, then and there, that this was not just about the tie and the loss of a knot. It was the loss of Hector I couldn’t stand. If only I knew where they had taken him. If only I knew he was all right, then maybe the knot in my stomach – the knot which got tighter every day – would go away.
Hector said the tie stood for something different. It was just the same as a collar round a dog’s neck. It said you were a part of something more than you alone would ever be. Hector said a uniform was a way of making us all the same, just numbers, neat boy-shaped numbers to be entered in a book. Hector wasn’t a neat number and I think they might have rubbed him out, but I can’t be sure of that. What I knew was that Hector was right. The knotted tie represented survival.

Now I was stuck, tie undone, my shirt buttoned wrong, my shoelaces a dead loss. I was a mess.
Eight

The corridor smelled of disinfectant, milk, boy’s pee and polish. The striplights looked to me like loneliness. They were too bright, they revealed everything. They made the emptiness ten times worse, showed me there was no Hector. A glass door banged and Miss Phillips, one of the school wardens, came out of her office carrying a cup.

‘What are you doing, Treadwell?’

She had a hard, no-nonsense voice but I’d seen her in the queues like everyone else, getting a little extra on the side. She looked down the corridor and up at the camera that went round like clockwork. She waited until the all-seeing eye was turned elsewhere then without a word she tied my tie, re-buttoned my shirt. She checked the camera, put her finger to her lips and waited for it to turn back on us before saying in the same, no-nonsense voice, ‘Good, Treadwell. Now that is how I expect you to arrive at school every day.’

Never would I have thought that the hard-boiled Miss Phillips had such a soft, sweet centre.